

Professor David Grusky, Department of Sociology, Stanford University

David B. Grusky is Barbara Kimball Browning Professor in the School of Humanities and Sciences, Director of the Stanford Centre on Poverty and Inequality, and co-editor of Pathways Magazine. His research addresses the changing structure of late-industrial inequality and addresses such topics as (a) the role of rent-seeking and market failure in explaining the take-off in income inequality, (b) the amount of economic and social mobility in the U.S. and other high-inequality countries (with a particular focus on the Great Gatsby hypothesis that opportunities for social mobility are declining), (c) the role of essentialism in explaining the persistence of extreme gender inequality, (d) the forces behind recent changes in the amount of face-to-face and online cross-class contact, and (e) the putative decline of big social classes. He is also involved in projects to improve the country's infrastructure for monitoring poverty, inequality, and mobility by exploiting administrative and other forms of big data more aggressively.

<https://sociology.stanford.edu/people/david-grusky>